'A film about the potential commonality of human desire'

What is it to be human and what kind of world do we want to see?

Is there a commonality in human desire? Do we all essentially want the same things in life? If not, how do socioeconomic factors drive any potentially conflicting narratives?

Who are we? What drives us? What would we love to be? What do we want our existence to become?

The fundamentals of being human, alive, now!

We appear to be at a crucial juncture in the timeline of human existence. The world is dominated by extremes of socioeconomic disparity, war and environmental destruction.

With so much at stake, is it not pertinent to gauge if there's a consensus as to what kind of world we could live in and if a collective vision seems apparent, how can we bridge the socioeconomic disconnect? How can we embark upon the systemic, universal changes required to bring us back from the brink.

Told through interviews with people from a vast array of socioeconomic backgrounds, the homeless the CEO's, the key workers, the politicians, the celebrities, the teachers, the inmates, the judges, the wealthy, the impoverished. A wider the cross section of human society will be essential to gauge if there are any common desires that connect 'US' regardless of background and the opportunities available.

Everyone is asked the same 5 questions:

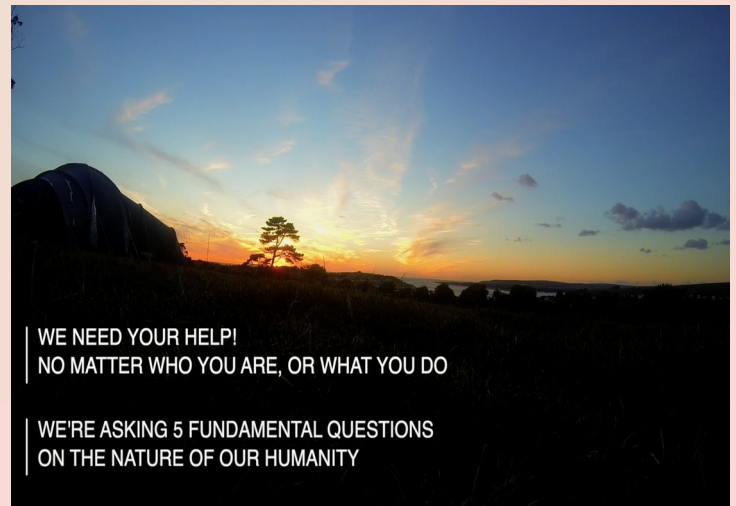

What do you do to survive? (What puts food on your table)

Do you believe in a spiritual existence? (Are we just material beings, or do you believe in a spiritual dimension to our being)

What drives you to keep going? (What are you passionate about, what are you protecting, What makes you happy)

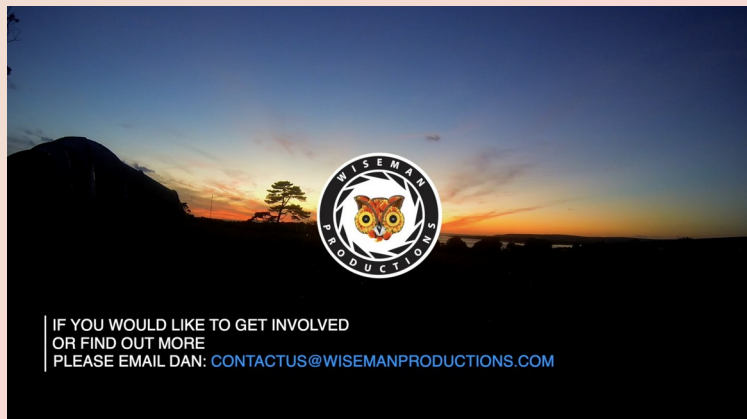

How would you like the world to be? (If you could change the world to your imagining)

What is the answer? (What do you see as possible methods and means of achieving that world)
